The big scold

The Election Commission must maintain neutrality

BECAUSE THE TRUTH INSIDES IS ALWAYS

EVEN in the election frenzy, sometimes one can find a real, rare gem. This week, the Election Commission did just that by putting the screw on those who are not quite conforming to expectations.

The Commission's intervention, through Election Commissioner Vinay Chand, was timely and valuable. It is not often that one hears from an election authority demanding an explanation from those who have not been acting as expected.

The issue at hand was a matter of critical import. The Commission, through its recent proceedings, had noted that the Supreme Court had given a final decision on the issue of reservations, and that the election authorities had been made aware of this decision. However, it was found that some of the information gathered by the Commission was not being made public.

This is a serious matter, as the Supreme Court's decision on reservations is a matter of great public interest. The public has a right to know the reasons behind the election authorities' actions, and the Commission has a duty to ensure that this information is made available.

The Commission's decision to demand an explanation from those who have not been acting as expected is a welcome development. It is a reminder to those who are involved in the election process that they are accountable to the public, and that they must act in accordance with the law.

It is also a reminder to those who are not quite conforming to expectations that they must be held accountable. The Commission's decision is a clear signal that it will not tolerate any attempt to manipulate the election process.

The Commission's decision is also a reminder to the public that the election process is not a matter for political manipulation. The Commission is there to ensure that the election process is fair and transparent, and that the public can have confidence in the results.

The Commission's decision is a welcome development, and it serves as a reminder to all those involved in the election process that they must act in accordance with the law. The Commission has shown that it will not tolerate any attempt to manipulate the election process, and it has set a clear signal that it will hold those who are not acting as expected accountable.

The Commission's decision is a reminder to the public that the election process is not a matter for political manipulation. The Commission is there to ensure that the election process is fair and transparent, and that the public can have confidence in the results.

The Commission's decision is a welcome development, and it serves as a reminder to all those involved in the election process that they must act in accordance with the law. The Commission has shown that it will not tolerate any attempt to manipulate the election process, and it has set a clear signal that it will hold those who are not acting as expected accountable.